April 2016. Submission for Supplementary Human Dimension Meeting
Tolerance and non-discrimination in Latvia: Persistent problems and 2015-2016 events

[1] Statelessness and rights of foreigners

Despite numerous international recommendations, including six from OSCE bodies,¹ the “non-citizens of Latvia” (a particular group of former USSR citizens and their descendants, who lack any citizenship now, while having right to residence in Latvia. As at January, 2016 – 252,017 residents, or 11.8 % of the population². Most are older than 55³ and their pensions rights remain limited despite a 2009 ECtHR ruling⁴) remain deprived of voting rights even in local elections. The next local elections are planned for June 3, 2017. Meanwhile, the naturalization rate has continued to slow down in 2015.⁵

In June 2015, a new law on industrial property proceedings⁶ was adopted. Like the old one, it prohibits “non-citizens” from working as patent lawyers, despite criticism having been expressed by the Ombudsman... in 2008.⁷ On a positive note, after a CJEU ruling against Latvia in September 2015⁸, citizens of other EU member states have been allowed to work as notaries, by amending⁹ the Notariate Law in November. “Non-citizens”, however, are still not allowed, despite their closer ties with Latvia.

One more difference between rights of EU citizens and “non-citizens” is going to be the right to vote in accordance with the draft Law on local referendums, currently considered by the Parliament.¹⁰

[2] Refugees

Latvia has agreed in 2015 to take less than 800 refugees from other EU countries. In December, 2015, the government has cut benefits for refugees from 256 to 139 EUR a month,¹¹ after much rhetorics about low pensions in Latvia.

In February 2016, the cabinet led by Mr Māris Kučinskis took office. In the declaration on intended activities of the cabinet, unwillingness to support refugees is expressed: “Latvia has exhausted its possibilities to host additional asylum seekers within the framework of the European Union’s mechanism for relocation of asylum seekers".¹² Notably, as at 1 January, less than 200 residents of Latvia had been given refugee of alternative status¹³.

In March 2016, the co-ruling National Alliance has published a call not to accept even the planned 776 asylum seekers from other EU countries, referring to the terror acts in Belgium and speaking of a possibility of a "numerically large, alien, inimical to the country" community.¹⁴

[3] Historical memory

On March, 16, 2016, an annual march honouring Waffen SS Latvian Legion veterans took place in the centre of Riga, with participation of MPs from the co-ruling National Alliance.

In advance, the counter-picket applied for by Latvian Anti-Nazi Committee had been ordered by Riga authorities to move farther from the route of the march, while a picket supportive for the march had been allowed in a closer place. An administrative court ruling upheld the restrictions.¹⁵

Several German anti-fascist activists, who intended to take part in the protests, have been prohibited from entering Latvia.¹⁶

[4] Language policy

In the declaration of the new Kučinskis cabinet (February, 2016), an intention to switch minority (bilingual) public schools to Latvian as the only language of instruction is announced: "A plan must be developed and launched for the transition to a unified education standard in the state language in state and local government funded educational institutions".¹⁷ This is contrary to the position of the High Commissioner on National Minorities.¹⁸ Meanwhile, in 2015, new restrictions for use of minority languages as languages of instruction came into force¹⁹ and the number of minority schools has continued to fall in 2014/15²⁰.

Supreme Court in February, 2016, has denied an opportunity to add a record of original name without Latvian-language endings (but still in Latin script) to passports of children born in independent Latvia, saying that the names recorded in birth documents (i.e., already-Latvianized) are the original ones.²¹

In March 2016, Latgale Regional Court has decided to deprive Mr Ivans Baranovs of his seat at Balvi Municipality Council due to his Latvian language skills being lower than require from local councillors by government regulations.²² One more similar case is ongoing in other court.

As at April 2016, a draft regulation is under consideration in the cabinet, aiming to impose Latvian language proficiency requirements on members of NGOs executive bodies.²³

In February 2016, the main Riga minibus public transportation company offered free rides on Valentine's day for kissing couples – different-sex only, despite objections by the Ombudsman.²⁴

[6] Misplaced “anti-extremism”

On May 12, 2015, web portal Zarya.lv, founded by several opposition activists, was refused registration as a media outlet. In its reasoning, the Register of Enterprises has claimed that the declared aim to resist “any language supremacy” is contrary to the constitutional provision on the status of Latvian as the sole official language.²⁵ On July 9, 2015, the Register of Enterprises has refused registration to a NGO, claiming that its aims to achieve granting citizenship to “non-citizens” are implying automatic granting of citizenship, which is alleged to be anti-constitutional. Besides, it considers that the use of the rare term “civic Latvians” (latvijieši) by the NGO aims to split the society and that its will to express “counter-action” (pret darbība) against discrimination and Russophobia might imply “any actions against other persons and organisations, based on their subjective evaluation of finding discrimination and Russophobia in specific cases”.²⁶

[7] Hate crimes, including hate speech

In 2015, two courts in a row have acquitted Mr Leonards Inkins, who promoted an Anti-Semitic forgery “Catechism of a Jew in the USSR”.²⁷ On a positive note, one can point to the first-ever criminal case on inciting religious hatred, initiated in March, 2016.²⁸

[8] Recommendations for Latvia:

- To sustain the network of minority schools and use of minority languages as languages of instruction. To differentiate Latvian language exam requirements for Latvian-only and minority (bilingual) schools.
- To grant voting rights to permanently resident “non-citizens” (and other permanent residents) in local elections. To simplify naturalization and to allow judicial review for all refusals to naturalise. To ensure automatic registration of newborn children of “non-citizens” as citizens of Latvia.
- To lower Latvian language requirements for local councillors so as not to interfere with popular choice and not to hinder minority participation in public life in Eastern Latvia.
- To allow “non-citizens” to work as notaries, barristers and patent lawyers, municipal police officers. To equate their rights to pensions with those of citizens.
- To allow use of minority languages in daily communication with local authorities, in topographical signs, and to allow writing personal names in identity documents without Latvian-language gender endings and with those double consonants not doubled in Latvian.
- To condemn discourses: a) honouring those having collaborated with Nazi Germany; b) equating phenomenon of refugees to terrorism threats.
- To raise both the benefits for refugees and the minimal pension.
- To adopt a comprehensive anti-discrimination law. In the meantime: to introduce anti-discrimination provisions to the Law on Residential Tenancy; to include language, sexual orientation and gender identity in the lists of grounds of discrimination prohibited in the Education Law, Law on the Rights of Patients, Consumer Rights Protection Law and Law on Social Security.
- To allow submitting individual complaints under CEDAW and ICERD. To join the protocol to the Convention against Discrimination in Education.
